"The Raiders of the North"

Two-reel Western

Featuring

George Larkin and Josephine Hill

NAN and her brother Frank come down the river and lake in a canoe and stop at a trading post. They claim to be visitors from the south on a pleasure trip. The post is ruled by Hagan, a tough character, whose word is law in the community. Hagan sees the two land. Nan makes a hit with him and he makes a play for her, thereby arousing the jealousy of his own sweetheart, Marie. Frank interrupts a scene between Hagan and Nan, and warns Hagan to keep away. It looks like trouble for the newcomers, with Hagan's gang closing in, when Jerry Burke of the Mounted arrives on his usual tour of duty. He prevents a fight and warns Hagan to keep the peace.

One of Hagan's men comes into the post and claims to have been robbed of furs down the river. A search is made and the furs are found in Frank's canoe. Hagan demands that he be arrested and hints that Jerry has caught one of the band of fur raiders operating in the district. Jerry seems to think so, too, and prepares to take Frank away with him. Nan pleads with them not to leave her, but Jerry tells her that she cannot go—he leaves her in charge of Marie. When Jerry and Frank have gone, Hagan renews his play for the girl. He tells her that if she will go with him he will work to clear her brother. Nan appears to fall for this very easily and goes with Hagan, after the latter has got Marie out of the way.

Marie rides away to find Jerry. She discovers him camped with his prisoner not far away and seeming in no hurry to continue.

Jerry and Frank follow Hagan, but make no attempt to catch up with him. Hagan leads them to his lair far in the woods. Marie, who has come with Jerry and Frank, becomes suspicious of them and escapes one night to warn Hagan. Jerry has been watching for a move on her part and so is ready to act. He and Frank attack Hagan's camp while all is in confusion and round up the gang. Then it develops that Frank is also of the Mounted Police, and his sister is Jerry's sweetheart. The whole thing was planned by Jerry to catch the gang.
